Q1. Read the passage carefully.

The idea that coffee is bad for heart pops up periodically. It was found that regularly drinking very strong coffee could sharply increase cholesterol levels. Researchers even isolated fat-like chemicals, cafestol and kahweol responsible for the rise.

It turned out that in the European brewing method, boiling water sits on the coffee grounds for several minutes before straining, this produces a high concentration of cafestol and kahweol. By contrast, the filter and percolation methods remove all but, a trace of these chemicals. Moreover, the studies involved large amounts of coffee, i.e. five to six cups a day. Moderate coffee drinkers drink only two cups.

Research has also shown that regular, moderate coffee drinking does not dangerously raise blood pressure. And studies have failed to substantiate fears that coffee might trigger abnormal heart rhythms (arrhythmias) in healthy people.

"For heart disease, I think the issue is closed," says Meir Stampfer, an epidemiologist at Harvard who had studied many aspects of coffee and health. "Coffee drinking at reasonable levels is unrelated to heart risk."

Evidence suggests that coffee may help fend off Parkinson's disease. A 30-year study of 8000 Japanese and American men found that coffee drinkers had one-fifth the risk of those who didn't drink the brew.

Scientists at Massachusetts General Hospital, USA, found indirect evidence that Caffeine the habit-forming stimulant in coffee may actually combat Parkinson's disease. The caffeine seemed to protect mice brain cells from depletion of the nerve chemical dopamine the problem underlying Parkinson's in humans. However, these are preliminary findings; human studies have not consistently supported caffeine's protective role.

The studies on coffee and cancer have focussed on three organs and are reassuring. You may remember a brief coffee scare in the early 1980s, when a single study linked coffee with pancreatic cancer. A false alarm: many studies since then have shown that the association is either extremely weak or non-existent.

If there's a connection between coffee and bladder cancer, it possibly applies just to coffee junkies. A re-analysis of ten European studies found an increased risk only among people who drank ten or more cups a day. And studies show that coffee seems to have no adverse influence on the risk of colon cancer.

Caffeine is such a powerful stimulant that the International Olympic Committee and the National Collegiate Athletic Association have set limits on how much content can remain in the blood during competition. In addition to boosting physical endurance, caffeine increases alertness and improves mood. The buzz may come at a price though. People who drink more than they're used to, may become restless and unable to sleep. Moreover, it's possible to become physically dependent on caffeine in days.

The question now arises: how much to drink? Those with heartburn and anxiety may want to see, if cutting back on coffee improves their condition. For most people, however, there's virtually no risk in consuming up to three normal cups a day. Harvard's Stampfer tries to keep his coffee drinking irregular enough to avoid habituation: "That way, I can get a buzz when I feel like it."

A) Choose the correct alternative :

8. It has been proven that coffee does not have how any adverse effect on the risk of - (1)
a) colon cancer b) diabetes c) lung cancer d) none of the above

Q2. Read the passage carefully. (10)

1. Today's kids can identify with none of the traditional toys. If it's a girl, she's busy adding to her Barbie collection, if it's a boy there's Tarzan or Superman or even Play-station and Xbox for him. Toy carts have made way for black and gold Ferraris and Lamborghinis. As for the cartwheels and windmills, few kids would know what you are talking of.
2. Many parents feel that children cannot even differentiate between toys that are Indian and foreign. All that matters is that they should be familiar figures or trendy playthings seen on television. In a market-driven economy, toy manufacturers are cashing on this trend.
3. The fallout from this is two-fold: one, the death of India's toy-making tradition, and two, the influences of an alien culture on a child's mind. That is why some social activists have begun campaigning for a ban on what they describe as "western toys".
4. "Indian toys are not only part of tradition but also contribute to the well-rounded growth of an individual's personality," explains Vaidehi Thakkar, a child specialist. "Besides, they are environment-friendly since we have a custom of making toys from bio-degradable material.
5. Clay modellers who used to make dolls, masks, an even in village fairs. Many have turned to farming the few left behind, are trying their hand at pottery and making idols during festival season.
6. Makers of toys from wood, paper and cloth are also complaining about diminishing clientele and they find themselves completed powerless in countering the popularity of machine-made toys.
7. "They are backed by big companies with big money, whereas we are artists struggling to make ends meet," says Udham Singh, who sells trinkets and balloons on Mumbai's pavements. "What can we do if people are determined to corrupt their children's tastes?"
8. But then, it is not as though all is hunky-dory with dealers of foreign toys. For one, they are very expensive and second, their shelf life is limited. With every passing week, newer and more sophisticated toys are entering the Indian market.
